

Lymericke and Paris

Homo Sapiens made no Tense

What is the difference between the Citti of Lymericke and Paris? Would it be very little, if we had a no future tense or a past tense? Would that be the case? If it was, our experience would be 'in continuum'.

It is the mortality of life that creates a past tense. The future tense is in a new life and is derived from the symbol of a birth. Both tenses are myths. The evolution of man created this myth of a past and future tense. Rivers and cities are a continuum and without man their codes of a before time and an after time does not need to exist nor does it exist. Alone, this does not explain why Lymericke and Paris are the same, but it creates the idea of a sameness had man not yet arrived at those places. We could say the same for other places with many other similar natural comparisons. So, what is special about Lymericke and Paris that should entwine them both in unison that bellows a unique sameness? Rugby, perhaps? We still need to show more.

In the beginning Lymericke and Paris were the same because each place shared a common benevolence from nature. When earliest man arrived, there was a beginning and thinking in continuum due to their closeness with nature. Evolution since brought sophistication and myth. It was the same myth from the same people with the same dreams and the same memories that arrived from the same places at almost at the same time and possibly within the same generation. Thus, this uniqueness was born with the same new beginning carrying a tradition from another continent that was all theirs. That was a very long time ago, before we knew things to be, because we had no words of theirs and could never know these people until now. The algorithm of words had failed to reveal this idea because they had been silenced by subsequent tragedies in history.

This tribe in an older time as black homo-sapiens arrived in their own boats from the same ocean with their chorus to find 'Our River' for 'our boats' that they called the Gaal. Their longing to settle carried the same dreams made of the same words and the same mindset. Their success was to make their new home that they would call 'Ours'. It is logical that after a long journey from a place that we now know as the Senegal River, they would want a place to settle that they consider was safe, and in continuum with their once tribal land from another continent. This tribe blessed their rivers with the same names: Shannon (Senos Ptolemy Map), and Seine; where both answered their chorus that rhymed the same, and both became 'Ours'. They were pragmatic empowered by their sense of presence; NOW.

Comparisons without a Tense in Their World:

Senegal River	Seine River	Shannon River
Sen/ e Gaal	Sen/	Sen/os / (Sinn Ros)
Our Boat	Ours	Our Water
-----	-----	-----
Isle des Gaal	Les Isle	Inish na Gal
East/West	East/West	East/West
Estuary	Estuary	Estuary
Long River	Long River	Long River
Same Ocean	Same Ocean	Same Ocean
Same Boats	Same Boats	Same Boats
Same River Topography	Ditto	ditto

With this Myth also arrived their Mindset. They built their places of spiritual adoration on each of their river islands originally worshipping Sheela na Gig. Subsequently, St Marys Cathedral and Notre Dame both in Lymericke and Paris respectively, commenced building at the same time their sacred locations of worship in memory of each of their Kings, Brian BORÚ and Louis VII. So now these rivers all have the same names, same boats, same islands and same places of adoration. From this mindset came leaders that built their cities. As in life and death, this continuum brought tragedies and distance that caused obfuscation between each and blinded the continuum in that experience.

Today, we must reclaim this concept of continuum, so to cherish our shared dreams and stories and our war songs, in our haakas in both Lymericke and Paris and complete what had begun, and to make magnificent cities that we all can call again to be Ours, on our rivers for our boats, and our families and with our dreams and our stories.
